FLOGGING IN EGYPT .- The maintenance of dikes and other irrigation works will always render a certain amount of ferred labor nec s sary; and though it is repugnant to our feelings to force men to work by beating them, still, as their own salvation depends upon their fulfilling this dury it is a question how far this sentiment should prevail in a matter of such vital interest to this country, among a population who have always been accustomed to this made of coercion, and who feel no disgrees attached to it. A curious illustration of this came under my notice while staying with a triend who was engaged in keeping the canals in good repair. A man who had persistently evaded his duries, seemed to be pricked by his emscience, and voluntarily came to him one day and said that he was trapaired to go to work on the capa', but that he could not do so without being compelled. He had never in his life worked on a canal until he had been beaten, and there was apparently something repugnant to his feelings to going to work upon one, even for pay, voluntairiy; he therefore requested that a hundred blows of the kurbash should be administered to him upon the soles of his teet. My friend rejuctantly acceeded to his request, thereby breaking the law; but the man received the required stimulus without a grosp, and went to his work in a peaceful and contented frame of mind, as one who had reheved his conscience of a heavy load. Oue could scarcely require a stronger proof of the extent to which a population may be denatured by a long cause of appression than the instance, which is perfectly authentic, furnishes.
